President's Corner

David Carmichael
Club members who have been reading the newsletter regularly in recent months will have noticed that one of the themes of my writings has been the importance of public lands to our sport of fly fishing. More specifically, I have suggested that we all need to remain vigilant in our efforts to preserve our public lands and to maintain our access to them. It seems that some citizens, even anglers and other outdoor enthusiasts, sometimes take our access to public lands for granted, failing to appreciate the wonderful gift they represent. The stewardship responsibilities implicit in this gift was addressed by Theodore Roosevelt more than 100 years ago:

We have fallen heirs to the most glorious heritage a people have ever received, and each one must do his part if we wish to show that the nation is worthy of its good fortune... So it is particularly incumbent on us to so act throughout our lives as to leave our children a heritage for which we will receive their blessings and not their curses. We have rights but we have correlative duties.
(Theodore Roosevelt, 1886)

The heritage to which Roosevelt was referring is the vast area of public lands, especially in the western United States, that the federal government holds in trust for the American people. He recognized that our wild lands are not to be enjoyed only by the rich (as is often the case in Europe) but by all of us. In a very real sense, the existence of open spaces and wild lands that are accessible to the public is central to our identity as Americans. Yet, there is a persistent and recently resurgent ideological threat to the maintenance of public lands in our own backyards. Indeed, even one of our New Mexico elected officials has sponsored legislation that would turn over federal lands to states or private entities, even though it is widely understood that doing so would lead to privatization. A number of media outlets have recently addressed the likelihood of privatization, including Trout Unlimited, The Theodore Roosevelt Conservation Trust, Southwest Fly Fishing, and High Country

News. I'd like to take a somewhat different approach in considering what we wish our land management and access to be.

This summer, Miriam and I have a wonderful opportunity to visit Scotland for a family wedding. After the wedding, we will spend some time in the Highlands, near the legendary River Spey which offers some of the best salmon and trout angling in the world. I wish I could say we will be fishing the Spey for a few days and catching a 20 lb. salmon, but at this writing I'm not even sure if we will be wetting a hook at all. Scotland, home of Spey casting, has relatively little public land; yes, there is fantastic fishing, but public access is very limited indeed.

Scotland contains about 30,000 square miles of land, about the same size as South Carolina. But, 432 people own half of the land; 16 people own about 10% of the country. Many families have been tenants for generations, as there is little land available in which to expand residential ownership. Public land amounts to 13.8% of the country, and that percentage includes Crown lands and the easements for highways, railroads and hydroelectric systems. In other words, rather little of the public lands are actually available to the public and suitable for fishing. If one wants to fish, it means becoming a member or a guest of a fishing club, or booking access to private waters.

To get an idea of the costs of accessing private water (most of the productive lakes and rivers), I looked up the rates for club waters and private estates on the River Spey. If one purchases access through a club, the rates are about $70 per day per rod. A season pass for a visitor runs $770. This doesn't include any gear or guide services. The most desirable beats are on private estates, many of which host anglers and hunters who stay at the estate, or who purchase fishing access to the river. At Tulchan Estate, the rate for fishing only is $370 per rod per day, or $2,215 per rod for a week. If one wishes to reserve an entire beat for a week, the cost is $13,293. Access to both club and estate waters is often booked months in advance.

Andrea Carmichael watching trout in a Highland stream for which we did not have fishing access (2003)

In comparison, public land holdings and access are far more available in much of the western United States. According to the US census, public lands comprise 39.8% of the country as a whole, with the highest percentage of federal lands (96%) occurring in Alaska. New Mexico and Colorado rank 9th and 10th with 47% and 43% public land respectively. Texas is essentially the reverse of Alaska, with only 4% public land and 96% private ownership. Not surprisingly, only 1% of Texas lands are available to sportsmen for hunting, often with a high cost of access... essentially the European pattern. In New Mexico, residents only pay about $35 to fish public lands for a year, and non-residents only pay $65 per year. Such access to quality resources is unheard of in many other countries, so we should cherish and defend our natural resources heritage.

Contrary to what one often hears from the politicians and the news media, the majority of citizens across the western United States are supportive of federal lands. In a poll recently published by the Missoulian newspaper (Missoula, Montana), 76% of the citizens polled in six western states, including New Mexico and Colorado, believe that federal lands help the economy of their regions, and the citizens of all those states favor federal management (over state or private). The majority of westerners (77%) approve of the BLM, USFS, NPS and US Fish and Wildlife agency efforts to manage public lands. Thus, the continued efforts to take lands away from federal management appear to be ideologically and politically motivated, and intended to benefit the few rather than the many, in defiance of what citizens actually want.

Carmichael Burn (creek), southern Uplands, Lanarkshire (2003)

So, as we search for a place to fish in the Scottish Highlands, I hope all of you are out enjoying the many benefits of fly fishing and keeping an eye on those officials and elites who would like to diminish our access to that very special heritage represented by our public lands.

PROJECT HEALING WATERS FLYFISHING

Ron Bellerose
PHW Coordinator

Project Healing Waters is in its summer slowdown pace with fly tying on the last Wednesday of the month at the local VA Clinic. We are planning a San Juan trip for 16–19 August. I will be out of State from 28 July until 11 August and I do not take anything electronic with me, so I will be out of touch with all but my phone, a flip top that only makes and receives phone calls.

We have donated fly tying material and equipment that is available at really good deals (donations). I will have some of the items at the board meeting in August as well as the September club meeting and fly tying. All donations go to supporting our local Vets.

Sportsman's Warehouse opens on July 29 and I have talked to the manager and we will be having some fund raisers at the store soon after the opening. Manager is in full support of PHW.

For more information about PHWFF see www.projecthealingwaters.org. Contact Ron Bellerose (575–680–5516), flyfishnh@hotmail.com if you wish to volunteer to help out.

Rio Peñasco Fishing Report

Evan Classen – 7/17/16

Arrived at 6:15am yesterday (7/16/16), weather was nice and cool. Fished the canyon section for several hours. It was dead! Nymphed at all levels of the water column, switching flies frequently. We caught dozens of chubs but the trout didn't show themselves. We saw one other group of 3 fishermen in the upper canyon area, they arrived at approximately 8am. At 10 we moved down to the lower parking lot and walked down below the falls. The second pool below the plunge pool was full of nice trout and many chubs. The huge brown that normally lives in the plunge pool has moved down there and we had him come up and examine a size 10 Dave's hopper before sinking down to the bottom of the pool. Landed 1 trout in 7 hours of fishing, very slow, was the closest I've come to being skunked in many years.
